The moderate form: It sought accomadation between reform and the traditional systems of power and faith. It tended to be deistic.

The radication form: It strongly opposed to the religous authority. It advocated the seperation between morality and theology.

The modern from of Enlightenment thought aims to balance reform with existing religious and political structures, while the radical form seeks to uproot and replace these structure with a secular, rationalist approach. Both forms agree that individuals should not be forced to adhere to religious beliefs and that the state should treat all citizens equally, but they differ in their attitude towards religion and the extent of change they advocate for.

Enlightenment absolutism refers to a form of governance where absolute monarchs embraced Enlightenment ideals and implemented reforms to improve society. During the Age of Enlightenment, supporters of the movement were not very democratic. They believed that most people would not question religion and tradition, making it difficult for them to accept the new Enlightenment ideas. Thus, they felt that an absolute monarch should introduce necessary reforms for Enlightenment. Some monarchs welcomed these thinkers to their courts and asked for their help in creating plans for social change. These monarchs included Frederick the Great of Prussia, Catherine the Great of Russia, and Joseph II of Austria.
